FRED KAVLI KEYNOTE ADDRESSES

THE  KAVLI FOUNDATION

THURSDAY

19:00 – 20:15 | Grand Amphitheatre
(7:00 PM – 8:15 PM)Arrested Development or Adaptive?
The Adolescent and Self Control*BJ Casey, Yale University, Department of Psychology, USA

Adolescence refers to the transition from childhood to adulthood that begins with the onset of puberty and ends with successful independence from the parent. A paradox for human adolescence is why—during a time when the individual is probably faster, stronger, of higher reasoning capacity, and more resistant to disease—there is such an increase in mortality relative to childhood. The increase in fatalities at this age is due not to disease but, rather, to preventable forms of death (accident, suicide, and homicide) associated with adolescents putting themselves in harm's way, in part because of diminished self-control—the ability to suppress inappropriate emotions, desires, and actions. In this lecture, empirical findings will be presented on how self-control can vary as a function of age, the situation, and the individual. Evidence for dynamic reorganization of the brain that coincides with apparent lapses in self-control during adolescence will be discussed in the context of evolution based biological constraints on the brain that may enable the adolescent to adapt to the many unique challenges of this exciting developmental phase of life.

FRIDAY

19:00 – 20:00 | Grand Amphitheatre
(7:00 PM – 8:00 PM)The Brain in the Ecosystem: Cognition, Culture, and the Environment*Atsushi Iriki, RIKEN Brain Science Institute, Laboratory for Symbolic Cognitive Development, Japan

Human evolution has involved a continuous process of acquiring new kinds of cognitive capacity to form novel culture. The dramatic expansion of the primate brain that accompanied additions of new functional areas would have supported such continuous evolution. Extended brain functions would have driven rapid and drastic changes in primates' ecological niche, which in turn demanded further brain resources to adapt to it. In this way, primate ancestors constructed a novel niche in each of the ecological, cognitive, and neural domains, whose interactions accelerated their individual evolution through a process of "triadic niche construction." Human higher cognitive activity can therefore be viewed holistically as one component of the earth's ecosystem, eventually comprising the "Anthropocene." The primate brain's functional characteristics seem to play a key role in this triadic interaction.

SATURDAY

19:00 – 20:00 | Grand Amphitheatre
(7:00 PM – 8:00 PM)Evolution of Emotions and Empathy in Primates*Frans B.M. de Waal, Emory University, Department of Psychology, USA; Utrecht University, Department of Psychology, Netherlands

Emotions suffuse much of the language employed by students of animal behavior—from "social bonding" to "alarm calls"—yet are often avoided as explicit topics in scientific discourse. Given the increasing interest of human psychology in the emotions, and the neuroscience of animal emotions such as fear and attachment, the taboo that has hampered animal research in this area is outdated. The main point is to separate emotions from feelings, which are the subjective experiences that accompany emotions. Whereas science has no access to animal feelings, animal emotions are as observable and measurable as human emotions. They are mental and bodily states that potentiate behavior appropriate mostly to social situations. The presenter will discuss early ideas about animal emotions and draw on research on empathy and the perception of emotions in primates to make the point that the study of animal emotions is a necessary complement to the study of behavior. Emotions are best viewed as the organizers of adaptive responses to environmental stimuli.

NEW APS JOURNAL

Advances in Methods and Practices in Psychological Science NOW AVAILABLE

Advances in Methods and Practices in Psychological Science (AMPPS)

AMPPS, a unique and innovative new journal, presents methodological advances from across all areas in our diverse field of psychological science. AMPPS articles are highly accessible and include:

- Empirical research that exemplifies scientific best practices
- Articles that communicate advances in methods, practices, and meta-science
- Tutorials, commentaries, and simulation studies for new techniques and research tools
- Papers that bring advances from a specialized subfield to a broader audience
- Registered Replication Reports, an innovative article type originated by APS

Walter Mischel (1930-2018)

ICPS 2019 is dedicated to the memory of Walter Mischel, whose vision and leadership were central to the establishment of this event, and whose influence continues to guide the mission of ICPS as an international showcase for science that crosses disciplinary and geographic boundaries.

APS Past President and ICPS Leader

Becoming a Cumulative Science

Bridge building opens phenomena that lie at the intersections among multiple disciplines, play out at multiple levels, and cannot be seen within the boundaries of any single discipline or captured in the work of any single investigator or lab....In short, problem driven interdisciplinary teams facilitate the study of interactions at nature's natural joints, unconstrained by artificial traditional disciplinary boundaries rooted in training programs and department structures set a century ago. It is a step towards becoming the increasingly "big science" that psychology can be.

A critical aspect of scientific training is to develop constructive responses to outcomes that are not successful. Every successful scientist/professional has stories of rejected papers and proposals. Once an individual is successful, rejections can be placed in context. Early in a person's career, the same rejections may be devastating. The difficulty of processing rejections may also prevent early stage researchers from hearing what is genuine in the critique of their work and to understand what might not be genuine. The WiCS panel will address these issues. Organized under the auspices of Women in Cognitive Science (WiCS).

FRED KAVLI KEYNOTE ADDRESS

THE  KAVLI FOUNDATION19:00 – 20:15 | Grand Amphitheatre
(7:00 PM – 8:15 PM)Arrested Development or Adaptive?
The Adolescent and Self Control*BJ CaseyYale University, Department of Psychology, USA*

Adolescence refers to the transition from childhood to adulthood that begins with the onset of puberty and ends with successful independence from the parent. A paradox for human adolescence is why—during a time when the individual is probably faster, stronger, of higher reasoning capacity, and more resistant to disease—there is such an increase in mortality relative to childhood. The increase in fatalities at this age is due not to disease but, rather, to preventable forms of death (accident, suicide, and homicide) associated with adolescents putting themselves in harm's way, in part because of diminished self-control—the ability to suppress inappropriate emotions, desires, and actions. In this lecture, empirical findings will be presented on how self-control can vary as a function of age, the situation, and the individual. Evidence for dynamic reorganization of the brain that coincides with apparent lapses in self-control during adolescence will be discussed in the context of evolution based biological constraints on the brain that may enable the adolescent to adapt to the many unique challenges of this exciting developmental phase of life.

From the Heart to the Eye: Interoception and Awareness

Contrary to the wealth of studies on external perception, interoception—the ability to perceive the internal state of one’s body—has been neglected in psychology until recently. Promising new theories suggest interoception lies at the heart of our ability to perceive feelings from our bodies and provides our sense of self-awareness and well being. This symposium brings together different research traditions on the topic of interoception that highlight how studying the ability to sense internal bodily changes may hold the key to understanding mental health, sociopolitical biases, and more.

Artificial Intelligence in Psychological Assessment

CHAIR: Annemarie Hiemstra, Erasmus University Rotterdam, Netherlands

Organized under the auspices of European Association of Work and Organizational Psychology. Rapid developments in artificial intelligence (AI), such as machine learning, are increasingly affecting human behavior. Psychology is needed to understand these influences. Furthermore, AI influences psychological science itself. Departing from work psychology and personnel selection, this symposium discusses how strengths of psychology and AI can be combined to improve assessment.

Changing Minds and Behaviours: Quantifying Persuasion Processes in Naturally Occurring Social Interaction

Enny Das, Radboud University Nijmegen, Netherlands

Persuasion often takes place in interactive environments that are difficult to capture in experimental studies. This workshop discusses methods to quantify social processes in naturally occurring interpersonal and online interactions. We examine how to measure key elements of social interactions, and causal effects on outcome measures relevant to the persuasion context.

Methods in Interoceptive Research: Challenges and Opportunities

Manos Tsakiris, University of London, United Kingdom

Aleksandra Herman, University of London, United Kingdom

To achieve its appropriate place within psychological science, interoception research must develop a wider and more grounded measurement model. This ambition necessitates wide-ranging, dedicated, and systematic theoretical and methodological enquiries into the hierarchical relations in interoceptive processing, the horizontal relations across interoceptive modalities and the causal relations between interoception and awareness. The workshop will discuss existing methods and recent methodological advances.

INTEGRATIVE SCIENCE SYMPOSIUM

13:00 – 15:20 | Amphitheatre Havane
(1:00 PM – 5:20 PM)

Changing Minds and Behaviours Throughout Society: The Greatest Challenge of Our Times

The question of how to change the minds of individuals or groups is a fundamental concern for a wide range of professions and academic disciplines. This integrative symposium will examine the state of the science on this complex issue and reflect on what professionals from various backgrounds can learn from each other's expertise on changing minds. Investigation and diverse research methods aimed at supporting successful aging.

Our Minds Are Not Our Own: The Role of Guts and Germs

All complex life evolved from and co-evolved with microbes. Our microbiome impacts our cognitive and physiological health, and compelling evidence demonstrates that microbes and other pathogens still shape fundamental aspects of animal biology. These findings raise new questions about human behavior at the intersection of human and microbial biology. The speakers in this symposium provide state-of-the-art overviews of how microbes in our guts and germs in our environment shape our behavior.

Clinical psychologists increasingly advocate that clinical training and practice should be based on scientific knowledge. This clinical science model showcases the primacy of scientific knowledge and training models in which science is fully integrated into all aspects of clinical training. The symposium examines exciting developments in clinical science and clinical science training from differing international perspectives.

Aha! New Insights about Insight

CHAIRS: Eva Van den Bussche, Vrije Universiteit Brussel, BelgiumHans Stuyck, Université Libre de Bruxelles, Belgium

Organized under the auspices of European Society for Cognitive Psychology. The sudden comprehension of a previously unsolved problem is often accompanied by the well-known Aha! feeling. However, the underlying cognitive processes that lead to this kind of insight remain unclear. In this symposium we will use a cross-scientific-domain perspective to elucidate the neurological and cognitive mechanisms behind the Aha! moment.

Contributions of Social Psychology to the Solution of Pressing Societal Problems

CHAIR: Kai Sassenberg, University of Tübingen, Germany

Organized under the auspices of European Association of Social Psychology. Social psychology has a tradition of studying humans in contexts of pressing societal problems. Providing a deeper understanding of human behavior and its change, it can thus contribute to the understanding and solution of these problems. This symposium features contributions applying social psychology to environmental, media, and health related problems.

Around the World in Five Field Experiments: Results From the Work of Behavioral Insights Teams

David V. Yokum, Brown University, USA

The World Bank reports that there are now 202 public entities all over the world applying insights from the psychological sciences to their policies and programs. This symposium brings together leaders from government units in Germany, France, Norway, Singapore, and the United States, each of whom will describe their work and present results from one of their signature projects. Discussion will also assess the progress of the “movement” and identify opportunities for future research.

WORKSHOP

16:00 – 17:20 | Room 251
(4:00 PM – 5:20 PM)

Experimentally Induced Sickness in Humans

Mats Lekander, Karolinska Institutet, Sweden

The workshop will describe how experimental methods can be used to trigger a transient inflammatory response in humans in order to study behavioral and neural responses to signaling from the immune system. Focus will be on lipopolysaccharide (LPS; endotoxin), a substance that causes a sickness response in which depressed mood, pain, and fatigue are central components.

The Emergence of a Broadly-Defined European Cultural Psychology

CHAIR: Matthias S. Gobel, Brunel University London, United Kingdom

DISCUSSANT: Ayse K. Uskul, University of Kent, United Kingdom

Organized under the auspices of International Association for Cross-Cultural Psychology. This symposium is a starting point for a broadly defined European cultural psychology. The speakers explore what a European culture may entail, how acculturation within the European cultural contexts takes place, and the conditions under which a multicultural Europe can be possible. What is currently missing from this research agenda will also be discussed.

Interdisciplinary Perspectives on the Science of Wine Tasting: A Discussion Panel

Charles Spence, University of Oxford, United Kingdom

DISCUSSANT: Barry Smith, University of London, United Kingdom

Drinking wine has been part of human culture since antiquity, and many of its psychological effects are well known. Though the practice of wine tasting is ancient, modern science – and notably cognitive science – provided a deeper insight on psychological processes involved in wine tasting. In addition, wine professionals use scientific insights to produce, present, and advertise wine and an ever-more-complex and specialized terminology to describe wine tasting. The objective of this panel is to bring experts together from science, humanities, and the professional wine world to discuss the current state of the art in wine tasting.

Personality Research Offers Windows into Psychological Development, Relationships, Success, Health and Ageing

CHAIR: René Möttus, University of Edinburgh, United Kingdom

Organized under the auspices of European Association of Personality Psychology. Personality research draws on other fields of psychology, synthesizing the phenomena that they focus on. But it also has a lot to contribute in return, as highlighted in this symposium. One central contribution is showing how individuals are not passive recipients of external influences but actively create their own experiences.

The Brain in the Ecosystem: Cognition, Culture, and the Environment

Atsushi Iriki

RIKEN Brain Science Institute, Laboratory for Symbolic Cognitive Development, Japan

Human evolution has involved a continuous process of acquiring new kinds of cognitive capacity to form novel culture. The dramatic expansion of the primate brain that accompanied additions of new functional areas would have supported such continuous evolution. Extended brain functions would have driven rapid and drastic changes in primates' ecological niche, which in turn demanded further brain resources to adapt to it. In this way, primate ancestors constructed a novel niche in each of the ecological, cognitive, and neural domains, whose interactions accelerated their individual evolution through a process of "triadic niche construction." Human higher cognitive activity can therefore be viewed holistically as one component of the earth's ecosystem, eventually comprising the "Anthropocene." The primate brain's functional characteristics seem to play a key role in this triadic interaction.

Collective Emotions in Cooperation and Conflict

Sporting events, political rallies, religious gatherings, and street demonstrations all testify to the importance of collective emotions in social groups. Yet, the mechanisms and consequences of collective emotions remain poorly understood. This symposium addresses the factors that distinguish collective emotions from their individual counterparts, how these emotions contribute to the emergence and consolidation of social identities, and the role they play in the digital age.

How Changing Our Bodies Changes Our Selves

No other period in history has seen such preoccupation with and dedication to the presentation, manipulation, and modification of the physical body—particularly its appearance—as a way to experience and socially share the self. This symposium takes a scientific perspective on the tension between identity and change at a time when technology increasingly helps us alter our appearance or present it to others.

Early Development of Superior Cognitive Functions

CHAIR: M. Rosario Rueda, University of Granada, Spain

Organized under the auspices of the European Association for Developmental Psychology. The early development of superior cognitive functions during infancy and toddlerhood has undergone enormous progress in the past decades, thanks to technological advancements and researchers' creativity. In this symposium, we will discuss timely research in the early development of four cognitive domains: language, social cognition, action understanding, and executive attention.

Body Ownership Illusions as Experimental Tools in Psychological Science and Cognitive Neuroscience

Henrik Ehrsson, Karolinska Institutet, Sweden

When we look down at our bodies, we immediately perceive that they belong to us. This perceptual experience of a body or body part as one's own is referred to as "body ownership." In this workshop, the speaker will discuss how perceptual body illusions can be used to study the cognitive processes that underpin the sense of ownership of one's body and various aspects of body representation. In particular, the focus will be on different versions of the rubber-hand illusion and the full-body ownership illusion, and the best ways to elicit and quantify such perceptual phenomena will be considered.

Emotions in Group Conflict and Cooperation

Emma Cohen, University of Oxford, United KingdomEran Halperin, Baruch Ivcher School of Psychology, Interdisciplinary Center (IDC) Herzliya, Israel

What psychological processes guide human conflict and cooperation, how can we measure them, and can they be regulated or changed? In this workshop, we will introduce a broad range of conceptual and methodological approaches that we have used to investigate emotional processes in the context of conflict and cooperation, emphasizing affective mechanisms on the individual, small group, and collective levels. Using examples from our own work and beyond, we will discuss merits and limitations of different conceptual approaches and methodological tools for addressing current challenges in the field, both scientific and applied.

It is widely accepted that integrative science—that spans disciplinary boundaries, geographic borders, and levels of analysis—is urgently needed in order to tackle some of the most important problems facing society today. At the same time, the path toward integrative science faces many challenges. Disciplines can differ in what is considered an appropriate research question, the methods they use for collecting data, even what constitutes data in the first place. Given these differences, how do journals dedicated to publishing integrative science of human behaviour evaluate and judge research? What are the barriers and best practices for publishing integrative science papers? What are the tips for early career researchers who are embracing an integrative approach? A unique panel of editors of leading psychological science journals will answer these questions and share their perspectives on integrative research.

Studying Cognition Across Languages and Cultures (a.k.a. Studying Cognition): Methods and Approaches

Lera Boroditsky, University of California, San Diego, USA, USA

The vast majority of research on human cognition has focused on undergraduates at elite universities. This means our current scientific understanding of the human mind is narrow and biased. This in turn presents exciting opportunities. Basic fundamental questions about human nature are at stake and much remains to be discovered. The speaker will present some practical methodological approaches for broadening the scope of inquiry.

Human Culture: What Is It and How Does It Work?

Culture has been credited for humanity's success as a biological species. Recent developments, however, suggest social learning—the capacity to learn from others—is not a uniquely human ability, but is distributed relatively widely in nature. How, then, is human culture different from cultures of other species? How did culture help humanity spread across the continents? What are the consequences of culture to cumulative cultural evolution and the future of humanity?

Studying Perception: Is It Worth It?

The separation between perception and cognition is a basic distinction made in psychological education and can be found in any textbook. Recent data appear, however, to erase this distinction. For example, cognition appears to affect processing from the very first moments, and there appear to be reciprocal connections between most levels of neural processing. At the same time, it may be valuable to distinguish between top-down and bottom-up mechanisms. Given these breakthroughs in our understanding of how the brain works, is it time to drop the distinction between perception and cognition?

Call for Nominations APS Rising Stars

Deadline: September 30, 2019

The APS Rising Star designation recognizes outstanding psychological scientists in the earliest stages of their post-PhD research careers. Nominations will be evaluated based on the following criteria:

- significant publications
- significant recognitions
- significant discoveries, methodological innovations, or theoretical or empirical contributions
- work with potentially broad impact

Eligibility for the 2019 nomination period is limited to individuals who received a PhD between January 1, 2013 and December 31, 2016.

Nominations Process: Each nomination must be supported by two APS Members, one of whom must be an APS Fellow. For information on submitting nominations, please visit:

www.psychologicalscience.org/rising-stars

INTEGRATIVE SCIENCE SYMPOSIUM

(4:00 PM – 6:20 PM)

The Consequences of the Evolution of Language on the Mind

The separation between perception and cognition is a basic distinction made in psychological education and can be found in any textbook. Recent data appear, however, to erase this distinction. For example, cognition appears to affect processing from the very first moments, and there appear to be reciprocal connections between most levels of neural processing. At the same time, it may be valuable to distinguish between top-down and bottom-up mechanisms. Given these breakthroughs in our understanding of how the brain works, is it time to drop the distinction between perception and cognition?

CO-CHAIR: Barbara Wanchisen, National Academies of Sciences, Engineering, and Medicine, USA

Organized under the auspices of The Board on Behavioral, Cognitive, and Sensory Sciences (BBCSS), United States National Academy of Sciences. The evolving nature of national security threats requires intelligence analysts to utilize cutting-edge knowledge and methods. Social and behavioral science research (focused on human behavior and social processes) is critical to the development and application of methods used in intelligence analysis. Examples of cutting-edge, interdisciplinary research and applications are discussed.

Trial-By-Trial Data Model Fitting

Yael Niv, Princeton University, USA

Computational models such as reinforcement learning models can be seen as precisely defined hypotheses about how experimental conditions will affect behavioral and neural data. This workshop will provide tools for testing such hypotheses: How we can use detailed trial-by-trial choices or reaction times to test hypotheses about model parameters (e.g., learning rate, exploration rate) and to compare different computational models. The methods are useful for any time-varying data in which one cannot average the data and use t tests.

Evolution of Emotions and Empathy in Primates

Frans B.M. de Waal

Emory University, Department of Psychology, USA; Utrecht University, Department of Psychology, Netherlands

Emotions suffuse much of the language employed by students of animal behavior—from “social bonding” to “alarm calls”—yet are often avoided as explicit topics in scientific discourse. Given the increasing interest of human psychology in the emotions, and the neuroscience of animal emotions such as fear and attachment, the taboo that has hampered animal research in this area is outdated. The main point is to separate emotions from feelings, which are the subjective experiences that accompany emotions. Whereas science has no access to animal feelings, animal emotions are as observable and measurable as human emotions. They are mental and bodily states that potentiate behavior appropriate mostly to social situations. The presenter will discuss early ideas about animal emotions and draw on research on empathy and the perception of emotions in primates to make the point that the study of animal emotions is a necessary complement to the study of behavior. Emotions are best viewed as the organizers of adaptive responses to environmental stimuli.

No matter where you are on your career path, HFES 2019 can expand your knowledge and help you find solutions to pressing HF/E problems with the latest forward-thinking research and applications. Join us at HFES 2019 to network and collaborate with colleagues, peers, and mentors from around the world.

At HFES 2019 you can

- Attend plenary sessions on hot HF/E topics
- Learn from in-depth studies in 120 concurrent sessions
- Participate in Practitioner Track sessions and UX day
- Get hands-on experience with skill-building workshops
- See HF/E in action on technical site tours
- Explore new career opportunities at the On-Site Career Center

HFES 2019 programs are presented by knowledgeable peers and include

- Invited speakers with insight in HF/E areas
- Technical Group meetings and poster receptions
- Networking events for early-career professionals
- Student Career and Professional Development Day
- Mentor/mentee events with professionals from industry and academia

Keep up with the accelerated pace of HF/E science and practice. Learn beyond your field of interest to lead, grow, and bring innovation to your field.

THURSDAY

19:00 – 20:15 | Grand Amphitheatre
(7:00 PM – 8:15 PM)Arrested Development or Adaptive?
The Adolescent and Self Control*BJ Casey, Yale University, Department of Psychology, USA

Adolescence refers to the transition from childhood to adulthood that begins with the onset of puberty and ends with successful independence from the parent. A paradox for human adolescence is why—during a time when the individual is probably faster, stronger, of higher reasoning capacity, and more resistant to disease—there is such an increase in mortality relative to childhood. The increase in fatalities at this age is due not to disease but, rather, to preventable forms of death (accident, suicide, and homicide) associated with adolescents putting themselves in harm's way, in part because of diminished self-control—the ability to suppress inappropriate emotions, desires, and actions. In this lecture, empirical findings will be presented on how self-control can vary as a function of age, the situation, and the individual. Evidence for dynamic reorganization of the brain that coincides with apparent lapses in self-control during adolescence will be discussed in the context of evolution based biological constraints on the brain that may enable the adolescent to adapt to the many unique challenges of this exciting developmental phase of life.

FRIDAY

19:00 – 20:00 | Grand Amphitheatre
(7:00 PM – 8:00 PM)The Brain in the Ecosystem: Cognition, Culture, and the Environment*Atsushi Iriki, RIKEN Brain Science Institute, Laboratory for Symbolic Cognitive Development, Japan

Human evolution has involved a continuous process of acquiring new kinds of cognitive capacity to form novel culture. The dramatic expansion of the primate brain that accompanied additions of new functional areas would have supported such continuous evolution. Extended brain functions would have driven rapid and drastic changes in primates' ecological niche, which in turn demanded further brain resources to adapt to it. In this way, primate ancestors constructed a novel niche in each of the ecological, cognitive, and neural domains, whose interactions accelerated their individual evolution through a process of "triadic niche construction." Human higher cognitive activity can therefore be viewed holistically as one component of the earth's ecosystem, eventually comprising the "Anthropocene." The primate brain's functional characteristics seem to play a key role in this triadic interaction.

APS is the leading international organization dedicated to advancing scientific psychology across disciplinary and geographic borders. Our members provide a richer understanding of the world through their research, teaching, and application of psychological science. We are passionate about supporting psychological scientists in these pursuits, which we do by sharing cutting-edge research across all areas of the field through our journals and conventions; promoting the integration of scientific perspectives within psychological science and with related disciplines; fostering global connections among our members; engaging the public with our research to promote broader understanding and awareness of psychological science; and advocating for increased support for psychological science in the public policy arena.

Artinis Medical Systems is an innovative Dutch company that develops near-infrared spectroscopy (NIRS) devices. NIRS enables you to non-invasively monitor oxy-, deoxy-, and total hemoglobin concentration changes in brain and muscle tissue. NIRS is a perfect technique for functional brain imaging and it can be easily combined with other modalities (such as EEG). Our goal is to make optical imaging easy. We do so by providing fit to purpose solutions, by focusing on usability within the design process and by providing superior after-sales support. Our products are wireless and wearable and can be used in the lab and out in the field. Visit our booth for a demonstration!
